

With Eyes Open: Training in Compassionate End of Life Care

led by Frank Ostaseski Monday, Oct. 25-Tuesday, Oct. 26, 9.00am - 4.30pm

The eyes of a dying patient are clear mirrors. In their gaze there is simply no place to hide. Being face to face with dying requires a fierce compassion and self-awareness that is best supported through mindfulness, inquiry and fearless receptivity.

This program is designed to support healthcare providers and caregivers to develop pragmatic skills and essential competencies in the psycho-social aspects of dying, strengthen individual capacity for compassionate service, and enhance spiritual development. We will investigate our relationship to death and the qualities that best serve at the time of dying such as applied compassion, a calm and loving presence and non-attachment to outcome.

Frank will weave together moving stories, Buddhist meditations, and good common sense developed over 25 years at the bedside. He offers a fresh and integrated approach to the dying experience that goes well beyond the traditional medical models. This is a wonderful opportunity for both personal and professional development.

You will Learn:

- The Five Precepts of true service as a guide to developing a mutually-beneficial caregiving relationship
- A model of listening from three centres (head, heart and body) that cultivates clarity, empathy and presence
- The place of attunement in compassionate care
- Mindfulness practices to develop self awareness and equanimity and to heal the heart
- The difference between a covenant of service and the typical contract for service
- An overview of the stages of transformation that can occur near death
- Using contemplative approaches in traditional medical settings
